(57) Abstract :

The present invention relates to the development and validation of a UV-spectroscopy-based method for the quantitative estimation of bioactive compounds from Calotropis gigantea in pharmaceutical formulations. This method involves preparing an extract from the formulation, determining the maximum absorption wavelength (λ -max) using UV-spectroscopy, and measuring the absorbance of the extract to quantify the concentration of Calotropis gigantea bioactive constituents. The method is validated according to International Council for Harmonisation (ICH) guidelines for accuracy, precision, linearity, specificity, and sensitivity. It is applicable to various dosage forms, including tablets, capsules, syrups, and topical preparations. This invention offers a cost-effective, efficient, and reliable solution for ensuring the consistency and quality of Calotropis gigantea formulations in the pharmaceutical industry. (57) Abstract :

The present invention relates to field of medicinal chemistry, specifically focusing on the synthesis and evaluation of novel pyrrolyl thiazolidinone derivatives for their potential antitubercular activity. A series of novel pyrrolyl thiazolidinone derivatives (4a-c) were synthesized through the reaction of pyrrolyl hydrazide with substituted aldehyde in ethanol to form pyrrolyl Schiff bases, which were then refluxed with thioglycolic acid and benzene. The synthesized compounds were confirmed using FT-IR, ¹H NMR, ¹³C NMR, and mass spectroscopy. Their in-vitro antitubercular activity was evaluated against Mycobacterium tuberculosis H37Rv strain using the Microplate Alamar Blue Assay (MABA) method, with isoniazid and rifampicin as reference standards. Among the synthesized compounds, 4b showed the most significant activity. In-silico molecular docking studies using PyRx and Discovery Studio software revealed crucial interactions and binding affinities, highlighting the potential of these derivatives as antitubercular agents.

EVALUATION

Please list your revision requests for the authors and provide your detailed comments, including highlighting limitations and strengths of the study and evaluating the validity of the methods, results, and data interpretation. If you have additional comments based on Q2 and Q3 you can add them as well.

The manuscript "Increases in the susceptibility of human endometrial CD4+ T cells to HIV infection post-menopause are not dependent on greater viral receptor expression frequency" presents a well planned and executed study. The authors have tried to tease out the causes of higher incidence of HIV among post-menopausal women. It is attempted to find underlined cause for higher incidence of HIV infection in post-menopausal women as found by epidemiological evidence. The experiments are well planned and executed. I have following specific comments to make.

1 The authors have not presented the participant characteristics. It would have been better to also present age distribution. It will be interesting to see if age is also a factor for higher infectivity as seen in the study.

2. Since the authors are doing experiments with mixed cell population, the data on other immune cells, especially NK cells, DCs and macrophages needs to be given. Do these cells also play a role in higher infection rate as they do produce factors that may affect CD4+ cells.

3. The authors allude to the role of Tregs as one of the reasons. It would be nice if they can present data on Trgs and CD4 infectivity after controlling for all other variables studied. That may throw more light on the role of Trg cells.

4. The authors should discuss possible reasons for why increased populations of CD4, CCR5 and a4b7 cells lead to greater infection rate in EM but not in CX and ECX.

5. Sentence 386-389 and 389-392 contradict each other. Authors need to explain this.

"Notable transmitted HIV drug resistance among people who inject drugs in Pakistan"

This study reports the presence of transmitted drug resistance mutation from five cities in Pakistan.

The study has used appropriate methodology.

The study refers to samples collected in the year 2014. Hence, the findings may not have any relevance to the National ART programme.

Presence of DRM mutation E138A in about 58% isolates in absence of ongoing ART programme is rather surprising. This is possible if this is polymorphism rather than mutation or if there is extensive networking among the PWID allowing such high prevalence of E138A mutation. My personal feeling is that it is a polymorphism; varying rates of this mutation are reported in different HIV subtypes and geographical areas. The author may include these points in the discussion. Also it will help if they refer to publications on the networks of PWIDs in the cities from where the samples have been collected. Considering that this mutation is not conferring resistance to the drugs in the National programme, it may not have any impact on the success of treatment. Hence this finding is not of significance for ART programme for the country.

Dear Dr Dodamani,

In view of your expertise I would be very grateful if you could review the following manuscript which has been submitted to Regenerative Engineering and Translational Medicine.

Manuscript Number: RETM-D-24-00080

Title: Corelation in stem cell technology, tissue engineering, and regenerative medicine

Abstract: Enormous advancements have been achieved in the biosciences ever since the discovery of stem cell technology. These advancements have paved the way for new research to be conducted on the unsolved problems that still exist in stem cell technology, tissue engineering, and regenerative medicine. The process of changing adult stem cells into pluripotent stem cells (iPSC), which is sometimes referred to as nuclear programming, has been a popular subject of research in the field of biosciences, despite the presence of ongoing moral and logistical challenges. Stem cell therapy has been proven to be incredibly advantageous for stem cell transplantation owing to its promised advantages over the limits of autologous transplantation of a person's tissues. Even though stem cell based treatment is not entirely capable of curing illnesses. The shortcomings of stem cell treatment have inspired researchers to conceive of potential solutions including tissue engineering technologies for regenerative medicine because stem cell transplantation seems extremely beneficial and promising. The field of regenerative medicine has been included in the field as a result of the development of embryonic stem-cell technology, which has led to a resurgence of attempts to combine potentially fruitful tissue engineering techniques. In this review, we have discussed the potential of pluripotency of embryonic stem cells in disease model, their relation in functional tissue engineering, regenerative medicine therapies at clinical stage and pre-clinical phase and try to explore the breakthroughs that have already taken place and future connections between stem cell technology and tissue engineering to potentiate regenerative medicine.
